What's New

CEOs Who 'Get It'

CEOs Who 'Get It' understand the significance of safety to their operations and corporate sustainability. But beyond that, they realize that engaging employees in a company culture of safety builds a strong network of people who care about one another and their contributions to their jobs. Understanding the Latest Injury Trends

Unintentional-injury deaths are increasing in this country, making it even more important for safety professionals to know the trends that can help them stem the tide. For an overview of the latest trends, see the Report on Injuries in America, highlights from National Safety Council's Injury Facts® 2008 Edition available this February. Compiled by the National Safety Council, Injury Facts® is the premiere resource for accident and injury statistics and their costs.

Is Your Industry High-Risk?

The National Safety Council's Safety + Health magazine makes "The State of Safety" its January feature. The good news in the story is, Bureau of Labor Statistics data shows that fatal workplace injuries are at their overall lowest rate since 1992, when the census was first conducted. Yet there is also bad news, as this chart helps illustrate: the same industries continue to be more dangerous than others. Demographically, Hispanic workers have an increased rate of workplace fatalities compared with their black and white counterparts. S+H article excerpt...
